

INDIANA JONES SEES ANOTHER WISHFUL ARK SHADOW ON MOUNT ARARAT UNDER THE ICE

All the while the actual Noah's Ark landing place has been known since its discovery by Reshit Sarihan, a young Turkish-Kurd farmer after a series of three earthquakes in May of 1948, on a mountain across the Aras valley to the south.

A new book by David Allen Deal, gives all the pertinent evidence and photos for you to make a proper decision. You will see the Ark landing site at 7,400 feet above sea level, and the place where the Ark later slid to impalement in a mud flow at 6,200 feet, and where its footprint exists until today. Of course, after over 4,500 years no wood remains. You will also read the world's oldest written story, The Epic of Gilgamesh, favorably compared with the Bible version of the flood and its subsequent history of Noah and the flood survivors. You will read about the "Anunaki" of the ancient Akkadians and Sumerians, and discover that they were not "ancient astronauts," as one famous author posits. You will see the remains of the Ark of Noah and its initial landing place higher up on Mt. Mashu.

You will see physical evidence of remains of the first post-flood city; "Mesha" - also known as "Naxuan," built by the flood survivors and their descendants, mentioned in Genesis 10:30. You will see evidence of the remains of the second city, called "Seron," mentioned by ancient, Armenian historian Moses of Chronensis (footnoted by William Whiston in his "Josephus' Complete Works"), and precisely why the Turkish government considers it "Nuh'un Gemisi" or Noah's Ark.

One might ask, "What is the Ancient American connection?" Well, there actually is a strong one, which you will find when you read the book. It is 192 pages, and loaded with good photos and new material, never before understood or published.
